The preliminary estimates of the Markit PMIs in the Eurozone are due for release at the end of the week. The sentiment indicators have reached or maintained high levels in recent months in both the manufacturing and service sectors, except in the French industrial sector. However, the index is also at a solid level compared to previous years. In this setting, slight declines seem likely. Major slumps are not expected as other sentiment polls have surprised to the upside in April. The components of the ZEW survey and Sentix investor confidence index have actually provided positive indications for the monthly rate of change. All in all, the benign economic scenario should be confirmed. In the US, attention will focus on existing home sales. After recovering from the financial crisis, sales have reached the level seen at the beginning of the property bubble in 2002, close to 5.5 million. Accordingly, the market is far from its peaks above 7 million. The ratio of the number of homes for sale to monthly sales reached a record low in January and remains very low at 3.8 months. While this points to continued construction activity and rising prices in the short term, it also suggests caution. Meanwhile, the outlook for March sales figures is positive and we therefore do not see any potential for surprises.

EUR-USD marked a high at 1.0776. Ahead of the French election, polls indicating growing support for E. Macron are leading to a fall in risk aversion and tailwind for the euro. Although the euro surrendered its gains again, the prospects are constructive. The next hurdles are at 1.0827, 1.0873 and 1.0906. Trading range: 1.0650 – 1.0780. ■
