

Sentiment clouded by fear of war

The escalation of the US/North Korea conflict dominated market sentiment yesterday and led to a sharp rise in risk aversion. Assets considered to be safe havens such as Bunds, US Treasuries, the Swiss franc and gold therefore posted gains (see pages 2 and 3).

In this setting, the influence of the latest data reports on the market receded into the background.

Nonetheless, today's US producer prices, for example, should not be overlooked entirely. We have recently mentioned the medium-term environment for the US and German bond markets, with reference to factors such as reduced inflation expectations. We also pointed out that we certainly expect potential for a reversal in the coming quarters. Moreover, producer prices signal a possible rise in inflation expectations. Accordingly, the new readings will probably be analysed for their mid-term implications.

The trends on the labour market are also interesting in this context. The weekly initial jobless claims look set to remain at the low level seen in recent weeks (around 240k) and bode well for continued robustness in the employment situation.

In Europe, the production figures in France and the UK for June will be of interest. The generally disappointing indications from Germany and Spain suggest that it is unwise to be too optimistic in the case of France, despite the strong business sentiment.

Bunds: buoyed by uncertainty

Bund-Future

The sabre-rattling between North Korea and the US is intensifying and interest in safe-haven investments remains high as a result. The beneficiaries of the geopolitical uncertainty yesterday were the Swiss franc, gold and German Bunds. Consequently, the Bund future exceeded the 61.8% retracement at 163.48 without any stimulus from the data front. From a technical perspective, there is little to prevent the recovery trend since early July from continuing, especially as the indicators are still issuing buy signals. The sideways trend in the ADX at a low level is the only factor that points to weak trend momentum. Avoiding a setback below 163.48 is now crucial. Our favoured trading range: 163.00 – 164.00.

Technical Analysis

Primary market

Demand for Bunds pushed the 10-year Bund yield to a low of 0.42%, its lowest level since late June. The undersubscribed OBL auction (bids: EUR 3.09bn) also failed to affect this trend. As a result, the tightening tendency in EMU periphery spreads largely came to an end. Spain was the only country that managed to keep its risk premium fairly stable at almost 97bp. By contrast, Portugal, Italy and Greece even saw spreads widen more considerably. However, the overriding picture remains favourable. Spreads have narrowed substantially in some cases since April. Whether we will see a lasting reversal of the trend or a continuation now depends on the geopolitical developments.

Risk aversion is bolstering safe-haven currencies

EUR-USD

Given the newly established sell signal from the MACD and the lack of stimulus from the data reports, the euro's correction has continued. However, losses have been limited, with a daily low of 1.1719. The currency pair should hardly be influenced by the US producer and consumer prices (due for release today and tomorrow), since it remains to be seen whether the figures may fuel interest rate expectations, which have been muted recently. Our favoured trading range: 1.1690 – 1.1800.

EUR-CHF (30 minutes)

EUR-CHF

The franc was the clear winner by the end of play due to the risk aversion stemming from the escalating conflict between North Korea and the US. The Swiss currency gained more than 1.1% versus the euro. The euro reached a low of CHF 1.1272. While the current exchange rate is far from this year's lows of around 1.0630, the Swiss National Bank (SNB) will probably keep a close eye on the franc's appreciation. The central bank has repeatedly stressed that the franc is overvalued. A massive appreciation in CHF could therefore revive speculation of interventions.

EUR-JPY

The yen is also a safe haven on the financial markets and has posted gains, despite the country's geographical proximity to North Korea. The resistance at JPY 130, which was breached only recently, was undershot once again. At the same time, the technical setting suggests caution. All of the indicators are now in sell mode. The downside move could accelerate below 128.50.
